Fragrant Orchids - Orchid Care Tips

There are very many types of fragrant orchids. They all smell different, too: some smell nice (such as Vanilla planifolia, the vanilla orchid), while others smell nasty (such as many Bulbophyllum orchids, which attract flies by imitating the stench of rotting flesh or dung.) It all depends on the orchid's species: some have a scent and others don't. Do your research to figure out which plants you want if you intend to build a nice-smelling orchid.

For many orchids, the maturity of the flower has some bearing on the strength of the scent, and it takes a few days after they are open before their scent can be detected. If the air is still, the fragrance is stronger than if it is gusty.

Immediately after a rainfall, the oils that emit the fragrance frequently have been diluted and are thus weaker. A A primary hybrid with Cattleya aclandiae
